and is confidently aſſerted to have been planted by Archbiſhop Cranmer. Its branches are very low, but its ſtem, which meaſures thirty inches in girth, has every poſſible mark of great age.

In the Dean's garden at Winchester, there was alſo, in 1757, a very antient fig-tree, whoſe fruit was of the ſmall red ſort. It was incloſed in a wooden frame, with a glaſs-door and two windows on each ſide of it, for the admiſſion of ſun and air. The frame protected it from wind and rain. On the ſtone-wall to which the tree was nailed there was a plaiſteriog, and ſeveral inſcriptions in the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin languages: one of them in the latter mentioning, that in the year 1623, King James the Firſt, as is there ſaid, 'Taſted of the fruit of this fig-tree with great pleaſure.' The other inſcriptions were paſſages in the Old and New Teſtaments, all alluding to the fig-tree. This tree has been ſuffered to periſh for want of neceſſary repairs to the frame-work.

At Oxford, in the garden of the Regius Profeſſor of Hebrew, is a fig tree brought from the Eaſt, and planted by Dr. Pocock in the year 1648, which is at this day in a thriving condition. It bears a black fig.

FRONTISPIECE.

Then, rising from the troubled brook, was seen
A youth with features pale and ghastly mien:
Above the circling stream he rais'd his breast;
His head alone was bare, all armid the rest:
His better hand the fatal helmet bore ——
